restrooms always meet expectations of cleanliness.¹

Safety and privacy

Many people plan their day around which public restrooms they feel safe using, especially those with specific needs. Privacy is a fundamental requirement for ensuring comfort and dignity. Well-designed facilities must provide secure, clean and reliable spaces that allow everyone to use the restroom without worry.

Wayfinding and access to hygiene

Finding restrooms in public spaces can be challenging, especially in large or crowded environments. Clear, intuitive signage in places like squares, airports, and train stations is essential for quick and stress-free navigation. Simple and easily understandable signs are particularly important for individuals with cognitive challenges.

Meeting the needs of as many people as possible

People who visit public restrooms vary widely and bring different needs and abilities. One might think it is enough to provide an accessible restroom, yet many needs go beyond wheelchair access. Individuals with limited vision or hearing, neurodiversity, reduced hand strength or incontinence may require additional thoughtful features that might be overlooked.

Public restrooms

Remove hygiene barriers so every visitor feels cared for in your restroom

Act now:

1. Ensure that soap and toilet paper are always readily available and easy to use.
2. Use low-force and certified easy to use dispensers. This helps visitors with low hand strength, arthritis, or temporary injuries.
3. Make sure that door locks work properly and provide secure, private stalls.
4. Replace fluorescent bulbs with warm light. Fluorescent lights are especially problematic for people with low vision.
5. Choose dispensers with a strong color contrast to stand out against the wall color (e.g., white dispenser on dark wall).
6. Offer mild, skin-friendly soaps. Stock dermatology-tested, fragrance-free soaps suitable for sensitive skin and eczema. Avoid harsh chemicals or strong scents that can trigger allergies.
